THE IMPERIAL PRESS CONFERENCE.

An exhaustive account of the proceedings of the Imperial Press Conference has just been published by Messrs. Horace Marshall and Son in the shape of "A Parliament of the Press: The First Imperial Press Conference. Written and Compiled by Thos. H. Hardman." A preface is contributed by Lord Rosebery, who sums up estimates of the Conference in the following words: "This fertile and original conception promises more for the unity of the Empire than any of the forms of Imperial congregation that have preceded it." The volume is a complete illustrated record of all the proceedings of the Conference, and gives verbatim reports of the speeches delivered at the six sittings of the Conference; while the social side of the gathering receives ample justice—the banquet at the White City; the various receptions Royal, political, civic, and journalistic; the day with the Army; the naval spectacle at Spithead; and the provincial tour, with its visits to English and Scottish seats of learning, industry, and commerce, and scenes of natural beauty. Incorporated in the volume is the retrospect of the Conference from the pen of our Special Correspondent, published in The Times of June 28.

The photographs, of which there are over 20, contain portraits of the leading promoters of, and participants in, the Conference, and depict some of the more noteworthy scenes in which the delegates took part. Perhaps one of the most remarkable—because it is more out of the ordinary—is the photograph of Lord Curzon's luncheon in the Great Library of All Souls. The compiler, Mr. Hardman, may be congratulated on having produced an excellent memorial, which cannot but be read with interest by all who appreciate the results of the Conference.
An exhaustive account of the proceedings of the Imperial Press Conference has just been published by Messrs. Horace Marshall and Son in the shape of "A Parliament of the Press: The First Imperial Press Conference. Written and Compiled by Thos. H. Hardman." A preface is contributed by Lord Rosebery, who sums up estimates of the Conference in the following words: - "This fertile and original conception promises more for the unity of the Empire than any of the forms of Imperial congregation that have preceded it." The volume is a complete illustrated record of all the proceedings of the Conference, and gives verbatim reports of the speeches delivered at the six sittings of the Conference; while the social side of the gathering receives ample justice - the banquet at the White City; the various receptions Royal, political, civic, and journalistic; the day with the Army; the naval spectacle at Spithead; and the provincial tour, with its visits to English and Scottish seats of learning, industry, and commerce, and scenes of natural beauty. Incorporated in the volume is the retrospect of the Conference from the pen of our Special Correspondent, published in the Time of June 28.

The photographs, of which there are over 20, contain portraits of the leading promoters of, and participants in, the Conference, and depict some of the more noteworthy scenes in which the delegates took part. Perhaps one of the most remarkable - because it is more out of the ordinary - is the photograph of Lord Curzon's luncheon in the Great Library of All Souls. The compiler, Mr. Hardman, may be congratulated on having produced an excellent memorial, which cannot but be read with interest by all who appreciate the results of the Conference.