

WOMEN OPPOSE CRITICISM OF AMBASSADOR

Lillian Scott-Troy's Caustic
Letter on Diplomat Fails to Please Local Suffragists

The disapproval with which Lillian Scott-Troy, formerly of San Francisco, views Ambassador Page and his utterances, as expressed in a cablegram and letter that she has sent from London to President Wilson, is not shared by all the women of San Francisco. Her characterization of the American ambassador to Great Britain as a "sycophant, a Benedict Arnold," "traitor" and the "smudged page" appear to Mrs. B. S. Wilkins, regent and leading member of the Daughters of the American Revolution, as "unjustifiable," while Mrs. Philip Bancroft, officer of the Women's Roosevelt league and prominent in suffrage work, finds it "difficult to take Lillian Scott-Troy's remarks seriously enough to give an opinion on them."

SENDS CAUSTIC CABLE

The caustic cablegram and letter of the same date were sent to President Wilson by Lillian Scott-Troy on December 5, the day following the Peace Centenary dinner in London, at which Ambassador Page was one of the principal speakers. The ambassador's remarks evidently irritated the lady considerably, as is evidenced by the text of the cablegram:

"Ambassador Page, at peace centenary dinner in London last night not only flagrantly insulted non-English speaking nations but grossly insulted the American nation as well. He said: 'In America they lacked the experience of Englishmen in generous hospitality; they lacked the fine arts that Englishmen had in many of the courtesies of life.' If you do not recall this sycophant immediately, the American people should recall you."

In her letter the writer says of Page: "Like Benedict Arnold, he rushes into bitter and spiteful comments on his own people in order to receive the crumbs which fall from the social tables of Englishmen. * * * Can it be possible that when Ambassador Page so glibly told his snickering audience that 'Americans lacked the fine arts of Englishmen in the ordinary courtesies of life, he had your excellency in mind? * * * This Page will long be remembered as the smudged Page.'"

CRITICISES PRESIDENT

The letter is a lengthy one, abounding in caustic comment not only on Ambassador Page, but on the president himself.

Mrs. S. B. Wilkins, regent and leading member of Daughters of the American Revolution, says of the letter:

"I have heard nothing of this, but, from the text of the letter, I should consider Lillian Scott-Troy's remarks unjustifiable. I can hardly believe that the ambassador's remarks could have been insulting to Americans. Either she misunderstood him or there was more to the speech which made it capable of a different interpretation. All Americans should uphold their ambassador, I believe, unless he does something particularly flagrant."

Editor. (Dec. 27, 1913). Women Oppose [Lillian Scott Troy] Criticism Of Ambassador. The San Francisco Call and Post. Reproduced for educational purposes only. Fair Use relied upon.

Editor. (Dec. 27, 1913). Women Oppose [Lillian Scott Troy] Criticism Of Ambassador. The San Francisco Call and Post. Reproduced for educational purposes only. Fair Use relied upon. Source: <https://www.newspapers.com/image/88962762/>

TRANSCRIPTION

WOMEN OPPOSE CRITICISM OF AMBASSADOR

Lillian Scott-Troy's Caustic Letter on Diplomat Fails to Please Local Suffragists

The disapproval with which Lillian Scott-Troy, formerly of San Francisco, views Ambassador Page and his utterances, as expressed in a cablegram and letter that she has sent from London to President Wilson, is not shared by all the women of San Francisco. Her characterization of the American ambassador to Great Britain as a "sycophant, [sic] a "Benedict Arnold," "traitor" and the "smudged page" appear to Mrs. B. S. Wilkins, regent and leading member of the Daughters of the American Revolution, as "unjustifiable," while Mis. Philip Bancroft, officer of the Women's Roosevelt league and prominent in suffrage work, finds it difficult to take Lillian Scott-Troy's remarks seriously enough to give an opinion on them."

SENDS CAUSTIC CABLE

The caustic cablegram and Letter of the same date were sent to President Wilson by Lillian Scott-Troy on December 5, the day following the Peace Centenary dinner in London, at which Ambassador Page was one of the principal speakers. The ambassador's remarks evidently irritated the lady considerably, as is evidenced by the text of the cablegram:

"Ambassador Page, at peace centenary dinner in London last night not only flagrantly insulted non-English speaking nations but grossly insulted the American nation as well. He said: "In America they lacked the experience of Englishmen in generous hospitality; they lacked the fine arts that Englishmen had in many of the courtesies of life.' If you do not recall this sycophant immediately, the American people should recall you."

In her letter the writer says of Page: "Like Benedict Arnold, he rushes into bitter and spiteful comments on his own people order to receive the crumbs which fall from the social tables of Englishmen • • • Can it be possible that when Ambassador Page so glibly told his snickering audience that "Americans lacked the fine arts of Englishmen in the ordinary courtesies of life, he had your excellency in mind? • • • This Page will long be remembered as the smudged Page.”

Editor. (Dec. 27, 1913). Women Oppose Criticism Of Ambassador. The San Francisco Call and Post. Reproduced for educational purposes only. Fair Use relied upon. Source: <https://www.newspapers.com/image/88962762/>

CRITICISES PRESIDENT

The letter is a lengthy one, abounding in caustic comment not only on Ambassador Page, but on the president himself.

Mrs. S. B. Wilkins, regent and leading member of Daughters of the American Revolution, says of the letter:

“I have heard nothing of this, but, from the text of the letter, I should consider Lillian Scott-Troy's remarks unjustifiable. I can hardly believe that the ambassador's remarks could have been insulting to Americans. Either she misunderstood him or was more to the speech which made it capable of a different interpretation. All Americans should uphold their ambassador. I believe, unless he does something particularly flagrant.”

